CANCER Answer line
American Cancer Society

A regular feature, prepared by the American Cancer Society, to keep you informed about cancer.

Question: "Does cancer occur in the mouth and if so, is there a warning sign?"

ANSWERline: In 1979, an estimated 24,000 cases of oral cancer will be diagnosed in both men and women in this country. Cancer can occur anywhere in the oral cavity. Tongue, lips, salivary glands, and the pharyngeal area (the area between the mouth and the esophagus) are the common oral sites. Oral cancer is not one of the major forms of cancer in the U.S. However, it is a special risk for users of any form of tobacco and for heavy drinkers of alcohol.

Your physician or dentist should check your mouth for possible oral cancer at the time of your regular examination. In between visits, pay attention to any mouth sore that fails to heal or that bleeds rather easily. Other signs and symptoms may be a lump or thickening, a whitish patch, difficulty in chewing or swallowing food, restricted movement of the tongue or jaws, or discomfort in wearing dentures.

Oral cancer can be treated most successfully when detected early. Get into the habit of checking your mouth in a mirror, using a good light.

Question: "Lately I've been hearing that cancer can be caused by the kind of work one does. Is this a new discovery?"

ANSWERline: No. The first treatise on the nature of diseases thought to be associated with the workplace was published in 1700, and by 1775 the first report of cancer being caused by a specific work environment was reported. Sir Percival Pott noted that chimney sweeps whose work kept them in contact with soot were prone to cancer of the scrotum. It is interesting to observe that this occupational cancer could have been prevented through personal hygiene and careful washing of work clothes. Today research is trying to define both potential cancer hazards in the workplace and ways to either prevent worker exposure or to determine safe levels of exposure. A number of occupational hazards relating to cancer have been found, especially in chemicals and processing industries.

Request: "Can drinking coffee and cola drinks lead to breast disease?"

ANSWERline: Coffee, tea, cola drinks and chocolate contain substances called methylxanthines. Recent experiments suggest that elimination of these substances from the diet of women with benign or non-cancerous breast lumps (a condition called fibrocystic disease) seems to result in a gradual disappearance of these lumps. However, the answers aren't all in. This evidence is only preliminary. What's needed now is additional research and the development of better tests for the measurement of methylxanthine in the body.

golf quiz

Q. What is the maximum allowable weight and minimum size of a golf ball?

ANSWER: Under USGA standards, the weight of the ball cannot exceed 1.620 ounces. The ball must be at least 1.680 inches in diameter. The USGA constantly tests new balls, clubs and other equipment in order to preserve the traditional character of the game. Equipment is tested by experts in aerodynamics, physics and other specialties on sophisticated apparatus.

The game of golf and its playing implements have been greatly refined and modified since Scottish shepherds first started hitting fleece-lined sheepskin balls around pastures shortly before Columbus discovered America.

In order to conform with the Rules of Golf, all golf equipment now must meet standards set by the United States Golf Association, the game's governing body. One of the regulated items is the ball.

The name of Sing Sing prison in New York was derived from Indian words meaning "stony place."

BACKGROUND ON BUSINESS

In this article, a leading American executive explains an interesting idea to help solve America's energy problems.

By D. L. Bower

America urgently needs to find and produce more domestic energy resources, especially oil and natural gas. This is the only realistic way to reduce our nation's growing dependence on costly foreign energy.

Bower

Yet a major shift in the Federal government's approach to managing the public domain threatens to place vast sections of America permanently off limits to minerals exploration.

Little Known Fact

A full one-third of our country's total land area, some 760 million acres, is owned by the Federal government. This includes 96% of Alaska, 86% of Nevada, 67% of Idaho, 65% of Utah, 52% of Oregon, 48% of Wyoming, 45% of California and 44% of Arizona.

Much of America's remaining onshore energy potential is located in these areas. Dean William H. Dresher of the University of Arizona College of Mines estimates that half of all known U.S. energy resources are located on publicly-controlled lands.

Despite this, the Federal government has already taken steps to set aside between 110 and 120 million acres of Alaska, even before Congress makes a final decision on wilderness policy. In all, the various legislative and regulatory proposals now being considered would permanently withdraw up to 245 million acres from any type of minerals development.

To appreciate the implications of this policy, 110-120 million acres is an area twice the size of all the New England states combined, plus the entire states of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia. If similar restrictive land use policies had been in effect in the early 1960s, the United States would never have discovered the 10-billion-barrel Prudhoe Bay oil field, the largest ever found in North America.

Our nation cannot afford to ignore the enormous energy potential of the vast areas controlled by government.

To help meet our nation's needs for energy, the U.S. should halt the withdrawal of public lands until their natural resource potential can be evaluated. When specific regions are set aside for parks, wilderness or other environmental purposes, the area should be no broader than necessary to protect the unique character of the land in question.

The Federal government may be cutting us off from needed energy.

Historically, we have always allowed multiple uses of public lands, where this is possible.

America's need for energy

Dean William H. Dresher

must be considered in decisions on land-use policy.

Jobs And Taxes

Right now, the U.S. depends on foreign crude and refined products for almost half of the petroleum our economy requires, at a cost estimated at $50 billion this year. This dependence costs America jobs, compounds the nation's balance of payments problem and deprives government of the additional tax revenues which would be generated by greater domestic petroleum development.

Unless we take a more reasonable approach in land use, we cannot expect to become more energy self-sufficient, or to solve the other economic problems our nation faces today.

D. L. Bower is President of Chevron U.S.A. Inc., one of America's leading energy companies.

Inflation - Fighting IDEAS

NEWS OF PROGRESS

Inflation's the major problem facing America—not just consumers but corporations as well. Higher costs concern and affect industry as much as they do consumers.

Controlling inflation won't be quick or easy. The only viable control alternative is slowing down the economy. One method, voluntary wage and price guidelines, has already been announced to spell out business and labor contributions to solving this vital problem.

As one major company, Sun Company, put it in a recent publication, "...controlling inflation is in everyone's best interest. Past experience has shown that voluntary controls stifle productivity and lead to inequities. But we intend to support the program to the best of our ability."

The undesirable alternative, as Sun sees it, is mandatory wage and price controls. And the company adds, "...if we want to retain the maximum freedom possible for our economy, we must work together—government, business, labor and the public—to control inflation."
